If a population is undergoing directional selection, can it be at genetic equilibrium?

A yes

B no

C maybe
For a population to be at genetic equilibrium, there must be no selection—all members of the population must survive and mate at random.

Answer B.

Starr'C'16'18 2002-10-23