If a population is undergoing directional selection, can it be at genetic equilibrium?

A  yes
B  no
C  maybe

For a population to be at genetic equilibrium, there must be no selection—all members of the population must survive and mate at random. Answer B.